They've already threatened expulsion from schools due to not following public health orders. Now you guys want to enforce fines, in the middle of a pandemic, in the middle of an economic recession, on 18-22 year olds with no degree who can't afford jobs? Where would that money end up going? This is just not a good idea to punish kids by fining them for.... being kids.

Hello,

I am emailing you in support of the administrative fines in Isla Vista for those who violate the Public Health Order. It is clear that many students in Isla Vista don't care about social distancing regulations or slowing the spread of coronavirus according to the immense partying that has been taking place, therefore I feel as though this is our only incentive to discourage them to stop. Many cities across the country implement a fine for those who don't wear a mask or are gathering in large groups, so I think it's only fair for those same standards to be held for our small college town where many responsible students would like to return for school.

Sincerely,
Jacqueline Mayes

i am a 20 year old student. i don't go to ucsb or sbcc, but i know people who do. there needs to be consequences for the actions of those who do not care about others. santa barbara is not just a college town. families and elderly people with compromised immune systems live there. i know of students of ucsb who are immune compromised, and the lack of regulations could kill them. we can not allow ucsb to raise a group of young adults that have no regard for those around them.
